An address to the freemen of the state of South-Carolina. Containing political observations on the following subjects, viz. I. On the citizens... Aedanus Burke

"THE proceedings of the late Assembly held at Jacksonborough have already excited the attention not only of this, but of other States; and some of the laws then enacted are of so serious a nature, that the memory of them will last, and their consequences operate, when the authors of the measures shall be no more. By one of those laws, upwards of two hundred men who had been citizens of this State before the reduction of Charlestown, have been stript of all their property: innocent wives and children involved in the calamity of husbands and fathers, their widows are deprived of the right of dower, their children disinherited, and themselves banished for ever from this country. And this without process, trial, examination, or hearing; and without allowing them the sacred right of proving their innocence on a future day. Under other acts of that assembly, a number of the inhabitants are subjected to heavy fines, some to near one third, others to one eight, and some to a tenth part of their estate, real and personal, without better proof of crime than report and suggestions. Another act excludes from the freedom of voting or being elected to a seat in the legislature, almost a majority of our citizens. The crimes of all consist in the part which they were said to have taken after the reduction of South-Carolina by the British army."

This is an edition of a classical book first published in the eighteenth century.
